Overschie. Holland possesses the notoriety of being the lowest country in the world, the greater part of it lying many feet below sea-level. The coast is practically surrounded by a series of dykes or vast embankments which check the inroad of the sea. Canals intersect the flat country in all directions, and prominent features of Dutch landscapes are the immense windmills, which, besides being used for ordinary commercial purposes, are utilised to pump the superfluous water into the canals which conduct it to the sea.
